MARTY MAKES A MILLION

John Bowson was a tired father when he reached home. He stretched out in the easy chair and just wanted to get a few minutes of rest before supper. Things had been rather disagreeable at the plant. He had had an argument with his supervisor.

"For two cents I would quit the job," he has remarked to one of his friends.

"Not when you have a family to support and especially a kid with one eye on college," was the answer.

"Hi, pop," greeted the voice of his teen-age son, Marty. "I got an idea in my head that ought to make a million dollars. Want to hear it?"

"No," replied his father. "The idea you keep. But why do you want to make a million dollars, when you are only sixteen?"

"Next year we have the senior prom," explained his son. "I plan to take Jeannette. Maybe you'll lend me your car and maybe you won't. But it would be wonderful if I could call for her in one of those big expensive cars with my own personal chauffeur. That's why I want to make a million."

"What can I say," grinned a tired father. "When I was your age I knew I was going to be a millionaire. But it didn't work out that way."

"So I'll make the million," added his son. "Mom has steak for supper tonight. They had a special sale at the Meat Market."

Mrs. Browson called her two hungry men to the table, and soon there wasn't the slightest evidence left to show that a big steak had been in the center of the table. After the meal had been finished, Marty helped his mother clean up the dishes.

"Mom," he began. "I got an idea in my head that ought to make a million dollars. Want to hear it?"

"No," smiled his mother.

"I asked pop the same question and he gave me the same reply," remarked her son. "Why?"

"Because neither of us want to hurt you and tell you that you are just day dreaming. Go ahead if it makes you happy."

"Does that mean I have your o.k. to make the million dollars?" continued Marty.

"As long as you do it in a honest way," said his mother, "you can make it. And hurry because I would like to buy one of those new automatic dishwashing machines."

After supper, Marty went over to see his girl. She at once could sense that something was bothering him.

"You were never good at concealing things," Jeannette told him. "So what is it?"

"I got an idea in my head that ought to make a million dollars. Want to hear it?"

"No," replied his girl. "We have to prepare that special report on the Nile River for Thursday. I got some of the books and clippings from the school library so you better start reading now."

An order was an order and especially when Jeannette gave its Marty worked hard and then left at nine o'clock. It was a clear and bright night. Millions of stars overhead.

"I wonder if any of you stars would like to hear my idea," he said half aloud.

"Talking to yourself or to the stars," interrupted the friendly voice of Miss Hortense Lewison, principal of the high school.

"Good evening, Miss Lewison," said Marty. "I just have an idea in my head that ought to make a million dollars. Want to hear it?"

"If it would make you happy, perhaps I might listen. But first of all I must know something. Did you tell it to your father?"

"He wouldn't listen," sighed Marty. "Neither would my mother or my girl friend. You'll listen, won't you?"

"Now you have me in a difficult situation," admitted the principal. "But know what I will do? Listen for three minutes and then give you my opinion."

She was willing to listen only because she had a kind heart. Boys and girls often came into her office with their various problems. Miss Lewison listened and her eyes almost popped out of her head.

"Mr. Johnson who is head of the Board of Education is also a lawyer," she replied: "I will have him in my office tomorrow at noon, and you can speak to him."

Marty went home and found it difficult to sleep that night. When he did fall into slumberland it was a dream of dollars that were all chasing him. It also rained dollar bills. In the morning he hardly had any appetite. He called for Jeannette on his way to school. Each class took a long time and at noon he went to the principal's office. She was expecting him and Mr. Johnson was there. He listened patiently and very attentively to what the teen-ager had to say.

"I will call up Mrs. Merton and make an appointment with her. You tell her everything just as you told me and show her the drawings."

Marty went home and at four the phone rang. Mr. Johnson was on the other end, and he had a message that made Marty excited.

"I will call for you at seven this evening. We are going to see Mrs. Merton. Now let me speak to your mother."

It didn't make too much sense to Mrs. Bownson. She did gather that the head of the Board of Education was taking her son to visit the wealthiest widow in the state. And she gave her consent. At seven Mr. Johnson called for Marty. Half an hour later they were in the large living room in the Merton Mansion.

"This young man found something interesting in the library while he was making a report on the history of motor cars," began Mr. Johnson. "Suppose I let him tell it to you in his own words."

"Your grandfather, Walter Merton, founded the Merton Motor Car Company in 1900. He built cars only for two years. But he did think it one of the best cars of his day. He made millions in the stock market, but he never forgot his car, The Merton. In his will he set up a very large trust fund. The original building is still intact and taken care of by a guardian. The fund can be used by anyone who would care to build the Merton car as it was originally build in its day. Taking into consideration a few necessary safety factors which can be added. Right or wrong?"

"You aren't telling me anything that isn't known," pointed out Mrs. Merton. "In fact if nobody wants to build the car, then the trust fund will go to charity in 1970. Who would want to build a car with a wooden body and steering stick that could go only 35 miles an hour?"

"I do," asserted Marty. "With a four horsepower air-cooled engine that should get 60 miles to the gallon. Add sealed beam headlights, a tail light, internal expanding brakes, automatic mechanical clutch, an electric starter, and at least two speeds forward—that's the same car with necessary safety factors added. I think it could be sold to business men for publicity, and even some stores would use that old type car as a delivery van.

This would put people to work and would be a good thing for the community. Do I get a chance?"

As executrix of her grandfather's will, Mrs. Merton realized a valid offer had been made.

"If you take care of the legal matter, Mr. Johnson," she said some drawings showing the additions to be made to the car which he has mentioned. You may hire the necessary engineers and go ahead."

She stopped talking and suddenly took a good look at Marty.

"Tell me," she wanted to know, "What gave a teen-ager like you such ambition?"

"Two reasons," explained Marty. "First is the fact that my dad works for the Lithopress Company and isn't too happy with his job. Second is the fact that next year is the prom. I want to take my girl to it in one of those big expensive cars with my own personal chauffeur."

"Those small matters can be taken care of with ease," asserted Mr. Merton. "Since I own the Lithopress Company we shall see what we can do about making your father happy. I have an imported Bentar Car. You may use it for your prom with my chauffeur."

They say that Marty is well on his way to getting that first million before he is twenty-one. He called for his girl in that big car. Though today, he rides around in one of the Merton cars produced by his company. Nobody could foresee that there would be such a demand for the novelty old time car that sold for $1600 F.O.B. Even the financial press has given him a write-up. He's still the same nice fellow, and Jeannette enjoys riding with him in his Merton. There's only one change in his family.

"Any time Marty gets an idea," said his father. We LISTEN!"
